

The sounds of body horror and medical intervention are source material for multimedia project
Marianna Simnett

“Multiple people fainted at the Serpentine,” says Marianna Simnett, recalling the 2015 screening and choral adaptation of her film trilogy The Udder/Blood/Blue Roses at London’s Serpentine Gallery. “It was on the refrain of a song. I was hanging upside down, with blood going to my head, going, don’t stand up, don’t stand up. And they just dropped.”

That’s not too surprising as Simnett’s film work is rarely an easy watch, frequently leaning towards uncompromising, often clinical imagery. Udders, invasive procedures, varicose veins, sworn virgins and cockroach farms have shared space with issues of gender identity and bodily agency. That’s not to suggest that her work seeks schlocky cheap thrills; the visceral is tempered with black humour and a narrative structure informed by fable and folkloric storytelling. Characters join in choruses, deliver poetic curses, or even burst into song.

Comprising a film, installation and soundtrack, her latest work Worst Gift is thematically linked to a film she made last year called The Needle And The Larynx. For that, she worked with a Harley Street surgeon who injected Botox into her vocal cords to lower her voice. “I see these as companion pieces, mainly because it was such a lengthy research process,” she explains. “I was looking at voice disorders and I was looking at gender, and what men do to lower their voices. I wanted to undergo that same procedure as a woman, and I was gearing myself together for invasive surgery. I knew the effect I wanted but not how I wanted to do it.”

And when it transpired that the way to achieve this effect was with the Botox injection, Simnett lived with the results for three months, noting the difference in how people would respond to her modified, low, weakened voice. “I don’t want to make work or fictions about something I haven’t embodied myself in,” she tells me. “I’m interested in temporary transformations of the body, things you could do willingly but come back from, like small lapses of consciousness or this strange warping or modulation of the voice, that out of choice I’m willing upon myself.”

For all its body horror and brinkmanship, Simnett’s work prioritises emotional truths over cheap thrills, and as such sits apart from an out-to-shock performance tradition. “Storytelling is more important to me than shocking,” she declares. Although abstracted and presented as fables, her narratives are often rooted in real trauma, “like my grandfather’s survival in the Holocaust, [because] he fainted at the same time he was shot at” (an incident alluded to in her 2012 film Faint). However, she concedes, “I’ll pretty much not know where my own limits are when it comes to having to do something for the sake of a project, and that might be to my own detriment one day, who knows. I don’t really have the boundaries some people might for cutting off. I’ll just do it.”

Tessa Norton

The Damage Done

Unofficial Channels
Pop Not Slop

Nathan Jenkins, also known as the producer Bullion and founder of the London based DEEK label, has been quietly compiling a canon of skewed and charming pop oddities since 2015 under the banner Pop Not Slop – also the label’s unofficial motto. Every so often, new entries to this ever growing playlist are listed via the DEEK Twitter feed. “For me, good pop music is imaginative, familiar and easily understood,” Jenkins says. “When you dumb it all down to a mindless formula, that’s slop. A lot of Pop Not Slop songs were never popular. The idea isn’t to be obtuse; pop is just more abstract than its name suggests.”

In practice, this means embracing an international mix of everyone from Godley & Creme and Marvin Gaye to Slapp Happy, Cleaners From Venus, Frigidaire Tango and Saáda Bonaire. Ryuichi Sakamoto and his Yellow Magic Orchestra associates crop up a lot, and Paul McCartney inspires particular affection. “He’s a total cornball but he’s made a huge amount of excellent music,” argues Jenkins, citing McCartney’s cover of “Tragedy” from the Cold Cuts compilation as a recent favourite.

Some contemporary artists make appearances – including Micachu & The Shapes, Ariel Pink and John Maus – but most of the playlist circles a late 1970s to early 80s sweet spot. The accompanying videos are a riot of ill-advised haircuts and some wonderfully lurid graphics that can be surprising – especially when, listened to as audio alone, the selections are both catchy and somehow timeless, transcending production tics.

“I’ve tried not to make it about any one time but a lot of wonderful pop was made in the 80s. The stars aligned between smart songwriting, bold production and big labels backing curveball pop types,” Jenkins says. And what of today’s pop? “It’d be foolish to write off so much music as bad, in any given time. It comes down to how dedicated you are to finding what you like.”

At the time of writing, the list is up to entry 342 (“Here Come The People” by New Musik) and Jenkins has expanded Pop Not Slop into an occasional club night and regular radio show on NTS. DEEK is planning a compilation for release next year, once a few licensing deals are finalised. From number 214 in the series, Jenkins opened the list to guest curators. One of his favourites so far is “Feel The Steel” by Way Of The West, chosen by Bahamian Moor. “People sweat over their choices,” Jenkins says, “I like how seriously they take it!”

deekrecordings.co.uk/pop-not-slop
Emily Bick